SJB SELECTION · NOVEMBER 2026

For some musicians, travelling is a phase. For Catfish Keith it seems almost like an address.

“I’m a Wanderer” speaks directly about the roving life.

Bottleneck guitar.

Rough voice.

Little decoration.

The strings scrape and slide. The metal leaves a dirty, living hiss.

Keith doesn’t turn the journey into a pretty photograph to hang on the wall. Inside this music you can also feel the weight of the road.

Leaving also means never stopping.

And never stopping can become as much freedom as sentence.

This is where the song’s nomadic stability is born: the only truly reliable home seems to be movement itself.

The journey is not a narrative accessory.

It is method.

It is sound.

It is identity.

The song moves like a train that recognises every station but chooses none.

That metallic creak of the guitar ends up sounding almost like the noise of the tracks.

> “I’m a Wanderer” doesn’t simply tell the story of a journey. It tells what happens when travelling stops being something you do and becomes something you are.
