Making the same mistake once is human. Twice, it happens. When you start recognising it while you’re making it again, though, the conversation gets far more interesting.

That is the heart of “Over Again”.

Staying when you should leave.

Knowing it won’t last.

Clinging anyway to the idea that maybe, this time, it will end differently.

And then finding yourself right back there.

The uncomfortable thing is that the song doesn't put all the responsibility on the other person.

Awareness arrives.

I know this pattern.

And I keep repeating it.

It's a blind awareness.

The neo-soul groove has a bittersweet flavour. David Kofi's keys build a liquid space, Farah Audhali's voice gives it emotional shape and the trumpet opens small blades of light.

The song feels like an emotional roundabout.

The right exit is right there.

You see it.

And every time you drive past it.

> The truly interesting part of "Over Again" comes when we stop asking why the other person keeps hurting us and start asking why we keep going back to the same place.
